Birth of a Blues Singer

by Mary Martin

EVERY young girl in New York, in Broadway musicals, nightclubs and social circles, and every theatrical agent, was informed that auditions would be held in WMCA's studio to select thirty girls to compete for a vocal scholarship. As I explained in my previous article my idea in awarding this scholarship was to make it a little easier for some youngster with talent to gain recognition without going through the heartaches and discouragements that so many of us experienced before finding some measure of success.

The girls who entered the contest were mostly professionals, but some amateurs—with professional pretensions—were in. All were beautiful, all given a chance. Paramount has announced that New York movie photos and facts about a few of the girls selected for the five consecutive Monday night programs to be broadcast over New York radio station WMCA. The broadcasts will run on every Monday through November and the finale will be held on the stage of the New York Paramount Theatre during the premiere of the new Bing Crosby picture "Birth of the Blues," which has a girl named Mary Martin in it.

One of the girls to get the nod of the judges was a striking brunette with short, curly hair, who was a professional singer and a professional dancer. She was a professional singer and a professional dancer. She was a professional singer and a professional dancer.

Two other girls who passed the test were Mary Ann, Paul, and a professional singer and a professional dancer. They were a professional singer and a professional dancer. They were a professional singer and a professional dancer.

One of the girls who passed the test was a professional singer and a professional dancer. She was a professional singer and a professional dancer. She was a professional singer and a professional dancer.

TO ALL OF THE GIRLS who entered the contest, I wish the best of good luck and to those who do not win, I wish the best of good luck and to those who do not win, I wish the best of good luck.

The girl who is participating in the contest is a professional singer and a professional dancer. She is a professional singer and a professional dancer. She is a professional singer and a professional dancer.
